What's new:

Editor at OtakuUSA, an American anime and manga website. SYNOPSIS It's a new year in high school, and two—or possibly three—high school girls are secretly in love: Kanade Shimomura (Chaplin Yuhki), a girl in the drama club who is deliberately oblivious to society's standard, dating a boy who is still in school; Haruhi Suzumiya (Natami Kasai), the head of the literature club, who has, for some reason, a complete relationship with nothing... and Yuki Nagato (Tsubasa Imai), a girl in the swimming club, who is subject to pestering ghosts. When one of these girls, and herself a central figure in her school's romantic drama, buys and wears a lolita outfit, without even asking, everybody notices. One thing in the medium of Japanese animation is particularly well-suited to showing the realities of high school: the outfits. Flailing teen girls in school uniforms making tragic, desperate or just plain silly faces can easily make you laugh, but they could also take you into a whole new world. Of course, unless you're a fan of anime, you may have never seen an anime opening. From the late 80's through the early 00's, anime OVAs and television series would open with a spectacular full-screen shot of some heavily stylized artwork. The stylization didn't extend to a literal painting of the OP, but it did serve for the girls of the series to introduce themselves, and sometimes to actually begin the story. At the time, aesthetics were not anything close to the greatest aspect of these openings. Out-of-synch dialogue, poorly translated speech, a voice in a different key from the music and, even worse, animated superimposed graphics were all just common, and all but ensured that some viewers would reject the opening. For the longest time, the story of Kanade Shimomura was the stuff of legend: two consummate loners, who felt misunderstood by the world due to their lack of social awareness; a passive mediator in her school's romantic triangle, and a long-suffering player in the school's NTR (Never-To-Return) club; a character who was called—and for good reason—an idiot by a popular high schooler. Her real name is Magi Kureha
