What is the meaning of "download" in the context above? A: Since you have mentioned the letter "e" in your question title, let me assume that the context is in fact about phonetics. When we read and listen, we are not just perceiving audio information; we are also subconsciously perceiving and memorizing the grapheme. This process takes place in the process of phonetic decoding, where individual grapheme (grapheme = a single letter) in a written string is decoded to a corresponding phoneme (a phoneme being sound made by a combination of grapheme, and may be realized in the oral and written languages by different phonemes). In English, the grapheme "d" is most of the time represented by the sound /d/, but different variants of the sound, or different different sounds, are more or less commonly pronounced as /t/, /f/, /l/, /r/, /z/, /dz/, /n/, /ŋ/, /k/, or /ŋg/. So the question is: by what "decoding mechanism" is the sound /t/ pronounced as /d/ when we "hear" and "read" the word "download"? The answer is that we are subconsciously judging our experiences by matching the phonetic information we are exposed to (the grapheme "d") with some existing "mapping", which associates the grapheme "d" with the sound /d/ (due to prior acquired experience), and if the mapping between the grapheme "d" and the sound /d/ does not match, we will have the impression that the grapheme "d" should be decoded to the sound /t/. The reason the subconscious linguistic/phonetic mapping does not always "match" is that this is a non-linear mapping in that it does not linearly follow grapheme to sound mapping in the English language. For example, a German speaker would have a different mapping than an English speaker because of the different history of the two languages. A typical explanation for this non-linearity is that the mapping of grapheme to sound is determined by the history of a language, and the mapping of grapheme to phoneme, on the other hand, is determined by the phonotactic constraints of a language. With the help of a technician, the police officer examines the fingerprints of a suspect, and then looks at the negatives of a bank photo in which the suspect is thought to be. Eventually, the officer President Donald Trump's longtime personal lawyer Marc Kasowitz will represent the U.S. in a Russia investigation by special counsel Robert Mueller. A source close to Kasowitz told The Hill the president's trusted attorney was confirmed Monday to work on the investigation at the direction of the president. ADVERTISEMENT The source added that it's a "typical" situation in which the president's attorneys have multiple clients and are unsure which ones they'll represent, but that it's "obvious" that Kasowitz is one of Trump's primary attorneys. Marc Kasowitz has a long history of representing clients charged with federal crimes, and has won several high profile cases. Over the course of a career that has spanned more than three decades, Kasowitz has collected numerous honors. Among them, Kasowitz was named the "Best Defense Lawyer" by Defense Group International in 2005, and for his representation of billionaire investor Carl Icahn in a high-profile case involving the Dalkon Shield in 1984. Kasowitz co-founded the law firm Kasowitz, Benson & Torres in 1981, and left to run his own firm in 1991. Prior to that, Kasowitz worked for former President Richard Nixon. ADVERTISEMENT Michael Dreeben, an experienced Justice Department attorney, announced in March that he would be Mueller's deputy, but he's been absent since.
