Thursday, September 10, 2010 How many times have you been in a web page and seen, after you click on the "Back" button, you see the page is loading, you see the whole page is loading and a few seconds later the page is loaded. We're not talking about the delay of loading a web page (this is a known practice to prevent the users from leaving the page), but after you have selected a web page and click "Back" button, but before the page is loaded all the elements of the page are loaded: you see the page, the titlebar, the time of the load, the address bar, the searchbar, the status bar, the history menu, the back button, the cache icons of the browsing history and the other icons, if any. This is a site wide delay that will delay the back button response all over the place. We have already seen how to disable the site wide delay in the web page, by enabling the "Disable Site Wide Delay" checkbox at the "General" page, under the "Global Page" category and the "Disable Site Wide Delay" checkbox is greyed out, then it is not possible to disable this delay, but if we have a quick look at the "General" page at the "General" category at the "Per Tab" category, there is another checkbox: "Disable Site Wide Delay for This Tab". So we can disable this delay by unchecking this checkbox
