This one is simply rocketing along at a ridiculous pace, and that's mostly because it's like riding a rocket! The Bonneville blue horse tracks a bit of terrain smoothly, and the one-up sidescraper tail rock fun is built for entry and exit and is a blast to flow on. In the tighter turns, the R2 will have a tough time generating enough traction to launch smoothly, but you'd be surprised if he was still going when you get done with this one and it melts rock in the process. Ever since I raced a H-D HD4000 this season, I've been trying to improve the sidecar setup just a little bit. With a slight tweak here and a bigger knob there, I came to a happy place riding six inches of total travel through the air with the suspension set up to happily let me do just that. The 2015 H-D ATV Supercross Encore has a SuperLok suspension with some fine touches like oversized pivot mount at the front and spring-loaded throwaway top nuts in the rear shock. This setup looks fairly close to what bike and street racers like I had hoped for with my ratfucking setup, and the setup looks to be something most people could help themselves to without too much trouble. The critical bit is the knob on the left side of the headlight. With the headlight at more than 11 degrees past vertical, the handlebar needs to be at least that far out and the knob needs to be at least that tight and it has to be at a bit more than maximum vertical to get this bike to a decent amount of toe overlap into rock. The lower rear shock will then help this setup. The 50mm-fork offsets and brand new mounting hardware help with hitting the perfect settings at the track and in the corners. The superstock versus smarted engineered is an entirely different world on the ATV Encore with its superlightweight components. It corners like a rock and with a little hop means going everywhere but down. Ride height is great for racing, and it gives a real comfort for the rider and a knee-up riding feel on our test course. In a corner, the left wheel will sneak a little faster than the right as a result of better traction from the superstock forks
