It's time once again for more of the Evil Overlord's notes on the world we create for ourselves, and for all the wacky ideas and worries that accompany it. This time, we'll be spending some time with bananas, and figuring out if we actually want them to turn into pearls, or fuse into cobblestones, and what we should do about all the excess bananas that are running around these days. So buck up, and get ready for the next installment of You Are Not a Banana: Better Edition. Time for a few ground rules. 1: I recommend the brilliant website 2600: The Hacker Quarterly. Besides the fact that the vast majority of its content is fascinating, not only do they not hold up google ads from being clicked, so that you don't get bombarded by ads in your RSS feed, they are the definitive source on the Intentional Interrogation Syndrome that seems to afflict around half of all people who are online. 2: If you want to come up with a list for yourself of things you know, you're not allowed to mention, I am going to mention them anyway: Positron emission tomography, AM2R, bmp, CSS preloaders, CRISPR, CSS3, LISP, AI, ReBind, ELF (for good measure), IPFS and a long list of things I've made up. If there's a list of things you know, you're not allowed to use, tell me, and I'll make sure the list I made to cover all of them is a little longer. 3: If you agree, you're not allowed to cut a banana in two. And if you disagree, and you cut the banana in half, you're out of our little group. 4: I am permitted to dabble in generalizations, and I use that right. Remarkably, the number one generalization I have to dumb people down for them is this: Domestic felid predators kill many of their own, when they hunt. Lions will spare partridge chicks, even as they kill the partridge chicks and eat them on the spot. Lions and wolves are much worse public relations problems than cheetahs, whose predation rate is light enough that it has basically no impact on the overall population sizes of the animals it takes and leaves dead. 5: If you don't want to know, at least read the references. You will be

Fuel efficiency of automobile engines is increasingly a major factor in consumers' decisions to purchase certain vehicles. A variety of vehicle and engine factors can reduce fuel efficiency. One important factor is the ratio of the reciprocating stroke of the pistons to the displacement of the pistons. In order to increase the efficiency of the engine, a portion of the displacement is typically taken up by a bypass system including a combination of a check valve and a segment of conduit. This permits bypass of a portion of the combustion charge to the crankcase so as to increase the distance traveled by the piston during each compression and expansion cycle of the engine. Various sizes of valve/check devices have been employed in engines. In one embodiment, the piston valves are configured to move in the axial direction of the valve, i.e., the direction of motion of the pistons. Typically, the valves are made from plastic, and typically include a tappet or dowel configured to be inserted or seated within the cylinder bore of an engine. In some cases, the valve member is composed of multiple components that are mounted upon one another, such as a rod and a sleeve. The rod and sleeve can be inserted as an assembly into the valve body of the engine. As the piston travels in the
