Moms ask the funniest questions - volkmarer ----- Bastion Mayer (n in the mirror), but if find this post to be completely unremarkable - except for the first question. As a child of the 1960's, all of my friends shared stories about their dad scaring them by leaving them in the dark room by themselves, and watching in horror as their friend suddenly yanked the door open. --- migawac There's not all of them. --- Heidemaa I find these questions funny in the way. 1) They're not really questions at all, just things that you do. 2) Having conversations with your friends about your kids is the worst thing you can do. Think about how it will feel to your kids! Seriously, you'll be spoiling them if you're not already doing it. And you'll be making yourself look dumb when they're old enough to ask you about the things you say. Seriously, your kids grow up on their own. They develop their own sense of values and beliefs and motivations. Do not try to screw with that. --- JoeAltmaer Well, once they're old enough to ask, they should ask. And they may stop you from saying things you don't want them to hear! But they aren't going to respond to your interpersonal talk about the world. they have their own. Its like telling their grandmother about gross stuff they see. --- helgenma
