the console's graphics hardware was based on the nintendo 64 (ngc) super nintendo entertainment system (snes) controller, enabling nintendo gamecube games to offer the ability to play super nintendo entertainment system games in the same way as the previous generation of game boy advance. the console hardware hardware looks like a cube, where the graphics chip and clock run on their own board located on top. this provides the ability to focus on the games themselves. this is reflected by the front ports' names as well. power is the ngc logo, open is the nintendo gamecube logo, reset is the power off, and memory card is the format. the two controllers provide full-power and half-power respectively. the controller buttons are left and right respectively, the a and b buttons have no function. the shoulder buttons control camera navigation and movement, and the start/select buttons have no function. the gamecube shares the same cartridge slot design as the nintendo 64, and is possible to play gamecube games on both the nintendo 64 and gamecube. the console has the port-for-port capability of the nintendo 64 and gamecube, with the addition of a game boy advance online player as a possible gamecube controller or game boy advance gamecube adapter (itself as a sold separately item). although the gamecube has no cartridge slot, game boy advance gamecube games can be transferred to the nintendo gamecube via a game boy advance gamecube cable. the gamecube's case can be configured in such a way that it can be opened and closed and flipped 360 degrees horizontally. the gamecube would go on to be nintendo's best-selling portable console of all time in japan, selling over 53.6 million units between 2001 and 2004.
