in fact, the shooting mode allows you to switch to creative mode, which allows you to direct the camera's settings and make adjustments in real time, either on the spot or in the camera and then transfer the results back to the computer with the select software option. the advantage is that you can control the exact exposure, white balance, and other settings that you'd use for manual shooting. if you plan to shoot in brighter light, don't use these settings. if you don't want to use a tripod, use the slide toggle and the slow motion options. the video you just imported to compose and the components you've applied are now ready to use in a motion menu as their own layers. if you're happy with them, then you can export them (in case you need to make adjustments or adjustments to the layers) or sync them to your computer. you can use them to create and save your own templates or just play them directly in a video editor. the draw tool is now available for motion titles, as well as new options for motion effects and motion layer colors and settings. you can either draw your title directly on your project, or create a page and then draw your title directly on it. to update your current title, load the title that you want to edit, then use the draw tool to make any changes. how do you fit all the photos and videos onto the a6 card? i would recommend you download the a5 and a6 snaps. these are seperate files without the snaps adding up to any crazy dimensions. you can put them in the same pic app, but i think the best way is to have them in seperate clips that you move around and glue them together. (if you dont have adobe after effects, you can use trim3d to do this. i use picwizard in between trim3d and after effects to make sure everything is arranged properly.) you can get a lot of great tutorials online. one place to start is adobe users groups. they can be a bit obsessive, but you can find some pretty useful information in there. the wedding industry website is a good place to look as well. the sites you list are great resources for professional looking videos.
