OK I'll admit it, I'm a bit of a hack. When I started off with Photoshop, I did the majority of my work in Lightroom and then copied the resulting edited images into Photoshop. I did that because I believed that it was a quicker process. I knew that once the image was in Photoshop, most of the information on every photo mattered to both my eyes and Lightroom, and I used the Selection and Export tools in Photoshop to make sure that I'd get the best out of the image and that the information I edited (or that I wanted to edit) would remain intact with the resulting file. Watermarks seemed to be working correctly on the few images I'd taken, and I wanted watermarks on most of my images. With a little effort and the help of online search, I've discovered how to have the best of both worlds. The ability to customize with layers in Photoshop has enhanced my workflow and has made the work more efficient and faster than ever, because it allows me to make changes to as many photos as I want without copying files around. Also, automatically conforming image after an Edit in Photoshop became another pro feature because it allowed me to start making automatic corrections to an image in time, a bit faster than Lightroom was capable of. If someone wants a suggestion for how they can use Photoshop professionally, I'd say that the only way to really do that is to master the tools. One very basic and helpful trick that I have become committed to is ensuring that as I'm working, I have my cursor key set on the layer control button. Now, when I have the layer selected, I simply hit the "backspace" key and it automatically removes the selected layer, which can really speed up workflow by eliminating many layers that I can delete as I go. I also use the Filter/Blur tool. It allows me to take a large number of quick and subtle adjustments to selected areas, without having to do the steps over and over again. I also use the Lasso tool to isolate area of an image and selectively make edits to it. This is a great way to go pixel-by-pixel and selectively modify the areas of images without having to really worry about cropping it into proper sizes or if it should be flipped or mirrored. Most importantly, it allows me to make creative edits quickly without having to start over.

The new Adobe Sensei-powered Neural Filters have been created by the company's AI team to let you change a person's expression in real-time. They work by running several machine learning models to predict what each person is likely to look like in a particular situation. The hope is that it's a way to help you create more striking imagery by letting you change the character of a subject's gaze in the time it takes to say "AI technology". This feature is available in Photoshop Standard, but not Elements, at the time of writing. To help you achieve even more with your pictures, Adobe has announced some new integration between its Elements and Photoshop software. This means you'll be able to see and share your finished photos in the software you use most often. You'll also be able to apply new photo effects in the program and have Elements update various adjustments on your photograph. The new integration will be available from the autumn. Adobe's new guidebooks can help you quickly master Photoshop and other Adobe products. It's an online learning platform featuring video tutorials, articles, and other content. You can study as much (or as little) as you want, and then, if you're ready, you can move on to the next lesson in the course. There are out-of-the-box courses for Elements and other Adobe apps, but you can also find them in the 'Additional Resources' section at the end of each course and choose what you want to learn. In October, Adobe will release a new Canvas course focusing on using Photoshop in magazines and design.
