There are a few great games on your site with awesome graphics and awesome features, I was wondering if you could give it a shoutout in one of the user experience compilations on the front page (if possible), especially for the ones that require flashplayer or java to play. If there's any that you feel would be good at that, please let me know. Thanks! Kirk "Thanks!" In my opinion the most important issue when developing e-learning courses is user experience. In the first place, there must be enough interaction between the instructor and the learner. Then I found another rather important issue when developing e-learning courses. It is the coverage of various e-learning technologies and techniques. The difference is that it is the learner who is actively involved while the instructor sits in his office and teaches the person how to use whatever e-learning technology or technique he has chosen. In my opinion this situation is rather "labor-intensive", because the instructor does not have direct contact with the learner. In the developing process of e-learning content he must look for and determine what works and what doesn't for the given learning material. It takes time, but if you want to make good e-learning content, you have to invest time in it. There is another aspect to this. It is the learner himself. This role of the learner depends on all the factors concerning the learning process. This goes for the learner himself, but also for his learning process and his needs. Some of the learners do not have any particular needs and do not need to plan his studies. If this is the case, then it is not important for him if the e-learning content is developed well or not. Others, however, do have more particular needs and specific requirements regarding how the learning process should go. They do have their own individual learning needs. One thing is for sure: they prefer an e-learning environment where they can plan their learning process, where they can actively use the e-learning course on their own and where they can follow their own needs. 79a2804d6b
