Complete ablation of p53 function in cutaneous squamous cell carcinoma by intratumor injections of dominant-negative mutants. P53 gene mutations are frequent in squamous cell carcinomas (SCCs) of the skin. The interpretation of these mutations is difficult owing to a lack of control specimens containing the same, only nonmutated p53. Mutated p53 protein is, however, a functionally dominant inhibitor of wild-type p53 function. Thus, to study the role of mutant p53 in an in vivo system, we developed a model system for complete ablation of mutant p53 function in mouse skin. On the basis of our previous studies with p53-haploid cell lines, we used adenovirus-mediated gene transfer of dominant-negative mutants of p53 as a strategy to inactivate mutant p53 function in tumor cells. This strategy is based on the observation that unmodified dominant-negative p53 mutants in transient transfection can specifically block wild-type p53 function. Mouse skin keratinocytes were stably infected with a recombinant E1-deleted adenovirus containing adenovirus-12S or 13S expression cassettes that express cDNAs for mutant p53 in trans. The two mutant p53 genes encode two different inactive mutants of p53, p53-15A and p53-195D. Skin was injected subcutaneously with these ad
